Of the patients started on home-based haemodialysis between November 1997 and December 2003, data from 83 patients were analysed. Patient, dialysis and healthcare facilities characteristics were compared between patients who remained at home and those transferred to in-centre haemodialysis. A larger proportion of patients with diabetic nephropathy were transferred to in-centre haemodialysis. Receipt of a home-based haemodialysis programme for 2 years was the strongest determinant for transfer to in-centre haemodialysis. Other predictors included single-dialysis patient, younger age, lower serum albumin level, less frequent haemodialysis and less frequent quality control reviews. Receipt of a home-based haemodialysis programme for 2 years was the strongest predictor of home-based haemodialysis. Substantially lower haemoglobin concentration and serum albumin levels, younger age and less frequent quality control reviews were also predictors of home-based haemodialysis.

Patients' characteristics are important determinants of choice of haemodialysis modality. Future studies should determine the effect of such predictors on patient outcomes. Q: What are the guidelines for answers? I think I'm getting accustomed to the SF site. However, I thought people here are pretty active and it seems everyone has a heavy opinion on something. Recently I have been posting questions, and not getting responses. I often have a sort-of answer, but not in the expected way. I just ask a question and then think of an answer. Often the answer I come up with is different than what the majority believes. I am not asking about spelling or grammar, but rather, I think it is about the quantity and
