Exposure and Contrast First things first. (So close, yet so far.) To begin manipulating photographs in Photoshop, you need to adjust the settings of the image. Unlike the old days, when images were traditionally printed (or at least reproduced) on transparencies, we're dealing with digital files that contain only the image. So, Photoshop displays every bit of an image as a number of pixels, and that number represents the size of the image (or at least how many pixels represent one inch on screen). If you want the image to be at a certain size when printed or displayed, you'll need to choose the correct size. There are three basic settings: Original. The size of an image prior to editing. You'll want to use this setting if you've taken the picture yourself, since you will likely have shot the image on a 1.5-inch or larger sensor. Saved for Web. This option will convert the original size of your image to a standard web page size, typically 1/3 to 1/2 the size of your photo. Print Size (or Pages). This is the size of the image as it's supposed to be printed, and can be anywhere from 4 by 6 inches up to a full 4 by 6-foot print. Not all images will need to be set at the correct size, but if you'd like to crop a photo to fit a specific area of the page, it's helpful to know the actual size of the image. Adjusting the brightness and contrast of an image is important for improving and enhancing the look of a photo. It may seem like you could just adjust the color channels, but adjusting the contrast and brightness affects the entire image rather than just the color channels. Setting the brightness and contrast To set the brightness and contrast, follow these steps: Select the photo. Click and drag on the photo to select the entire image, and then release the mouse to open the Adjustment panel. Deselect the Auto Smart Preview check box in the Adjustment panel. This will allow you to use the brightness and contrast options to apply the changes to the entire image. Adjust the brightness and contrast of the image. Click the Brightness icon in the Adjustment panel. To adjust the brightness, use the +/- icon to increase or decrease the image's brightness. Press Enter to set the brightness of the entire image. Adobe Photoshop creates high-quality images, but not all graphics designers, image editors and photographers can afford the hefty price tag or use the software needed to create their own images. Photoshop Elements is a similar suite of programs to Photoshop, but it costs half of what Photoshop does, and it's designed for people who want to edit photos to share with friends and family. What's in Photoshop Elements?

Adobe Photoshop Elements can be used to: create high-quality images edit photos create graphics for websites if you can still afford a pro version, use the older version of Photoshop Elements with only the 'advanced' features At this point you'd think Photoshop Elements is similar to Photoshop or even Photoshop CC. But it's not a simple suite of programs. It has a more simplified user interface, and there are just as many features as Photoshop CC. How do I open and edit my images with Elements? You can use Elements to open, edit and save images, create PDF documents, and resize images, among other things. Open an image file (JPEG, PNG, GIF, etc.) Go to File > Open (or click on the Open tab). Select the image file and click Open (or click OK if your file is already opened). You can also locate the file you want to open by clicking on the file name. The file is automatically opened in the image editing window, but you can go to an existing open window. Click on the Window button in the lower left corner of the interface to return to your image window. Scroll down the left side of the screen and use the icons to select a desired area of the image. You can move and zoom the image so you can see the entire photo, select an area of the image to edit or add text. Once you've selected a portion of the image to edit or add text, you can use some of the options to make the changes. Add text to your image Click on the Text tab to open the font and style tool. Select a font and style from the drop-down list and add text to the image. The new text is added at the top of the image window. Click on the Text tab again to save the text to the image. Edit an image (or more) Go to File > New and create a new photo on the canvas 05a79cecff

One of the common side effects of sleeping pills is loss of memory. A new study from University College London suggests that getting enough sleep may be vital in this regard. The researchers studied sleep patterns of 439 adults from the general population who took part in a study on sleep habits. Sleep quality, during the two weeks of the study, was ranked as good, average or poor. Participants reported their usual total sleep time during the last two weeks, and a questionnaire was used to rate their sleeping pills use during the same time frame. Average sleep quality was not associated with an increased risk of memory loss, whereas a poor sleep quality was associated with a 5.7 fold increased risk of memory loss. Participants who used sleeping pills frequently had a increased risk of memory loss (2.8 fold) compared to those using sleeping pills intermittently or not at all. An increased risk of memory loss was also associated with an increased use of sleeping pills at night (2.1 fold), the frequency of daytime napping (2.1 fold), and alcohol intake (1.7 fold). Even though the researchers did not find associations between previous night's sleep duration or total sleep time and risk of memory loss, they suggest that "more frequent sleep fragmentation may have adverse effects on sleep-dependent memory". A 2009 study from the MRC Epidemiology Unit found that sleep difficulties were associated with falls in old age (2.1 fold) and with dementia (2.9 fold) but researchers said that "other work shows that longer or more fragmented sleep is a risk factor for dementia." They added that, "the complexities of the association of sleep with cognitive function should be considered in future studies." For the present study, the researchers used the World Health Organization sleep questionnaire, and to collect data for alcohol intake, they used a questionnaire and an answer sheet.

Strengths and limitations The study has some strengths and limitations. One of its strengths is that it uses data from a large general population sample. It also includes objective measures of sleep duration and sleep quality. This information, in combination with self-reported measures, has the potential to provide more detailed understanding of the relationship between sleep and memory. Also, this study has a randomized sampling method, which means that the association between sleep quality, sleep duration and memory loss can be considered valid. One of its limitations is that it was not able to collect information

Roadshow Mazda Roadshow Mazda is an automotive review show on the British terrestrial television channel Watch. It is presented by Tim Peake and Jozef Stark, and recorded at Mazda's headquarters in Hamamatsu, Japan. Format Twice a week (Tuesdays and Fridays), five new cars, brought to Mazda's headquarters in Hamamatsu, are presented to host Jozef Stark. These cars are then featured on the programme's website, with a short review of the vehicle and video/images of the exterior and interior of the car. Each week, the executive editor of Roadshow chooses a car to drive around Mazda's home city of Hamamatsu. Over the course of the season, the presenter then drives the car up to London and picks a date for a road test. The producer then chooses cars from the Roadshow workshop for the original three-day team test. At the end of the week, a review of the car is presented to the viewers, and finally, a short countdown of the most loved cars on the show is aired. Broadcast Roadshow Mazda premiered on the digital terrestrial TV channel Watch on 23 January 2012. The programme is shown on Fridays at 7:00pm and on Tuesdays at 7:00pm. Example: public class Product { ... public int ProductId { get; set; } ... public int ProductTypeId { get; set; } public SelectList ProductTypeList { get; set; } } ... @Html.DropDownList("ProductTypeId", Model.ProductTypeList, Model.SelectedProductTypeId, new { @class = "form-control" }) However, when I do the research, System Configuration appears to be used when creating the HTML for this. In ASP.NET Core, does System Configuration or Source Configuration create the property
